Carol Jarvis and team publish in journal

Endocrinology & Research RN, Carol Jarvis with Kim Simcox, Jade Tamatea, Kim McNulty, Win Meyer-Rochow, John Conaglen and Marianne Elston have published the findings of their study in the April issue of Clinical Endocrinology.

Carol and her fellow researchers investigated the incidence of iodinated contrast-induced thyrotoxicosis to determine whether thyrotoxicosis was more common in patients 70 years and older compared to younger patients following administration of iodinated contrast media.

Patients are being exposed to large amounts of iodinated contrast during contrast-enhanced computed tomography (CT) and angiography. The typical exposure from a CT scan is 35 000 mg iodine resulting in an acute iodine load more than 200 000-fold higher than the recommended daily intake.

Patients with underlying thyroid abnormality or elderly patients may be at an increased risk of developing hypo- or hyperthyroidism following routine administration of iodinated contrast media used in CT investigations.

Te Kete Marie – the peaceful basket

Request a copy of the article, "Te Kete Marie – the peaceful basket: an initiative for supporting people with dementia or delirium" recently published in International Journal of Palliative Nursing.

The authors, Leanne Bolton and Tanya Loveard, a Registered Nurse and Occupational Therapist, work at the Mary Potter Hospice in Wellington. Bolton and Loveard, recognising that caring for patients with dementia or delirium was a challenge for the unit staff, developed a toolkit to improve care for these patients.

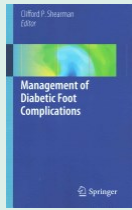

"The initiative has noticeably changed the culture within the inpatient unit interdisciplinary team in regards to caring for a patient with dementia and delirium."

The name Te Kete Marie, the peaceful basket, reflects the concept of empowering both a confused patient and the interdisciplinary team, with a peaceful approach to the provision of care.

Publishing tips — time, space & energy

A staff member who is publishing her first book shares some tips to encourage fledgling writers to give it a go.

Time, space and energy are critical elements of a successful writing venture. Time set aside to work on the book, space to be able to lay out your work, and the energy to grapple with the task.

Be wary of distractions that can draw the writers attention too easily Distractions lead to a loss of focus often leading to weeks of wasted time before the writer can get back on track.

In the early stages spend some time on preparation. Background reading on the subject helps the writer to clarify and consolidate their own ideas. Write these ideas on a whiteboard to help organise thoughts.

Evidence alone is never sufficient

Evidence alone is never sufficient to make a clinical decision - expertise is required to move from evidence to recommendations. UpToDate now provides graded recommendations to help you make confident treatment decisions.

Click on "Summary and Recommendations" at the top of a topic outline to view a topic's graded recommendations.

Is this a strong or a weak recommendation?

UpToDate introduces Recommendations.

Grades have two components: a number (1 or 2) reflects the strength of the recommendation and a letter (A, B, or C) reflects the quality of the evidence supporting that recommendation.

How to really learn from failure

Read Julian Birkinshaw and Martine Haas' article "Increase your return on failure" published in this month's issue of the Harvard Business Review.

The authors describe three steps to raise your return on failure

- Learn from every failure
- Share the lessons
- Review your pattern of failure

"One of the most important—and deeply entrenched—reasons why established companies struggle to grow is fear of failure"
